Causes of Urban Flooding Urban floodwaters are often the result of high precipitation, snowmelt, or heavy and fast-moving storm-related rainfall. From hurricanes to heavy winter rainstorms, urban flooding can be a natural and expected part of the weather cycle. Urban flooding also frequently results from human intervention and can occur on a small or large scale. For example, large-scale stormwater management projects, like the Biggest Loser competition, can cause extensive urban flooding.

Causes of Urban Flooding Urban floods are influenced by a variety of factors, including precipitation, soil saturation, topography, building age, and other factors. Individual floods tend to be a result of combination of these factors.

Precipitation Precipitation contributes significantly to urban flooding. When heavy rainstorms move into areas with impervious surfaces (like paved roadways), the stormwater can't be absorbed. Instead, it is channeled into storm sewers, streams, and lakes. Storm drains carry stormwater away from a region as far as a quarter mile from the place of precipitation. If the storm drains are not large enough, the saturated soil will back up into local streets. Flooding in downtown streets usually occurs when the rain is coming in slowly and is being absorbed by the soil. If the rainfall is intense, like a thunderstorm, the soil could become saturated too quickly. As such, the streets can fill up more quickly, making it more difficult to drain the water. To keep stormwater out of the street, catch basins and gutters are used. Without the capacity to drain properly, areas will flood during a rainstorm.

Soil saturation Soil saturation is most commonly caused by a lack of native vegetation, such as grass and trees. When there are no vegetation, the rain has nowhere to drain. The saturated soil then has nowhere to go. Stormwater runoff will continue to travel into the earth and eventually enter the nearby stream or lake.

Topography Urban floods are also influenced by how topography affects flow. Raised areas, like hillsides, cause the water to travel faster than it would on a flat area. In addition, high-water flows can be more damaging to structures due to the force of
