For example if we have to calculate a thermodynamic property that contains heat per mass for a cooling system, we have to know the heat capacity as a function of time. But can we use dimensional analysis to predict a scale? For example: If the time is scaled by mass and the temperature of the system by force, can we predict the actual value of the heat capacity? What happens to the value of the heat capacity when we change the mass, force or both? A: A scale is defined as a physical property that only depends on dimensionless numbers (not "dimensionless"). Dimensional analysis is the way to predict properties of a physical system (not scale values). However, the result is only as good as the input data. If you use "dimensionless numbers" (called "constants") you can always get the right result. (I.e., you could take any two dimensions, and pick numbers for them, and the resulting dimensionless numbers would be the same). If the time is scaled by mass and the temperature of 82138339de
